ALL BETS ARE OFF

Gambling addicts made more than a million pleas for bookies and online casinos to ban them last year.

The startling figures follow a Gambling Commission report this month that found 78% of punters felt there were too many opportunities to bet in Britain these days.

It also found almost half of British people admit to gambling - up 3% on last year.
MP accepted gifts from bookmakers

A Nationalist MP’s links to the gambling industry have been questioned after it emerged that she had accepted gifts from betting companies.

Corri Wilson hosted a breakfast briefing for William Hill at Westminster and was behind a parliamentary motion that condemned Britain’s bookmakers.

Ms Wilson, who sits on the SNP’s national executive committee, has also praised bookmakers on social media and posted numerous photographs of her visits to betting shops.

The Times has established that the member for Ayr, Carrick and Cumnock accepted gifts and hospitality worth £1,400 from companies involved in the gambling industry, including free entry to every race meeting in Scotland.

A charity has claimed that Ms Wilson, who won the seat at the general election in 2015, appeared to have been “seduced” by the gambling industry.

The SNP insisted that Ms Wilson had been helping to protect jobs in her constituency, which contains Scotland’s largest race course.

On April 20, 2016, she tweeted a picture of herself flanked by William Hill banners and wrote: “Opening the William Hill plc breakfast briefing I am hosting this morning. Discussing gender equality within the betting industry.”

Shortly afterwards, on June 20, she praised the company again after being invited to make a charity bet at a shop in Cumnock. “I found the visit useful and it was good to find out more about William Hill’s approach to the community and responsible gambling. I think it is really important to engage with the gambling industry.”

“Every MP, the length and breadth of the country, has betting shops in their constituency, employing local people and contributing to the make-up of their communities.”

Ms Wilson noted that she had concerns “about the impact of gambling on poverty” but added: “I have found William Hill, and the betting industry in general, to be responsive to criticism and to be enthusiastic about looking where it can improve.”

On September 30 last year she registered receiving “race tickets and hospitality” with a total value of £400 from William Hill.

On another occasion, April 9, 2016, she thanked Ladbrokes on social media for allowing her to make a free charity bet, while on July 22 the Association of British Bookmakers (ABB) tweeted a photograph of Ms Wilson visiting a Ladbrokes branch in Ayr. A week later she visited Coral in Ayr, tweeting: “Interested to hear about women in the economy and local economy impact.”

On July 13 Ms Wilson, the SNP spokeswoman on disability, submitted an early day motion that called on MPs to welcome the launch of Gamble Aware Week. It said: “This House further welcomes the efforts to promote responsible gambling through initiatives such as the nationwide self-exclusion scheme and new mandatory alerts on gambling machines and further notes that betting shops have been part of our high streets for 35 years.”

Gamble Aware Week was created by the ABB, whose members include William Hill, Ladbrokes and Gala Coral.

Simon Perfitt, of Rethink Gambling, said: “It is very concerning to learn that Corri Wilson appears to have been seduced into submitting an early day motion which called on MPs to welcome the launch of Gamble Aware Week.”

He claimed that politicians were being pressured by bookmakers, saying: “MPs have spoken to tell us they are lobbied on an almost daily basis.”

On January 24 this year, Ms Wilson registered a gift from Scottish Racing Marketing Ltd of “a metal badge entitling the bearer to admittance to every race meeting in Scotland during 2017. The badge is not available to purchase but its estimated value is between £0 and £1,000 depending on usage.”

The SNP said that Ms Wilson had done nothing wrong. A spokeswoman said: “Corri Wilson is fully aware of the issues of problem gambling. She has offered to meet with Rethink Gambling to hear their concerns.”

Peter Craske, of the ABB, said: “We engage with politicians of all parties to update them on our responsible gambling initiatives and highlight the importance of our industry, which supports 5,000 jobs and contributes £110m in tax and business rates in Scotland.”
‘I fear that many middle-class people have no idea what a curse to the nation betting and gambling are today. ‘

Commercial reality

• Survey of 1,000 UK adults shows engagement with gambling is high (45% vs 43% in our 2016 survey) and continues to rise (+2pp vs our 2016 survey) with growing Online participation (now at 24%, +2pp). This equates to a 63% online penetration of gamblers we surveyed, a particularly high level owing to the online methodology we used, which is more likely to attract heavy internet users. We also show new data from the Gambling Commission that shows supportive trends on market growth and customer dynamics.

• What are the industry trends? The drivers of structural growth remain in place. Mobile penetration continues to grow, and younger demographics are betting on more devices from more locations more regularly. We anticipate 12% online market growth in 2017 and 9-10% in 2018-20.
State of the industry (i)

• Revenues still growing (UK online is third of the market)
• Trading conditions becoming tougher (but it’s all relative)
• More regulated markets = certainty + cost
State of the industry (ii)

• Cost + maturing markets = competition
• Scale more important = consolidation, M&A, fewer operators.
• Innovation and new products.
